

Global Studies in Human Sciences (GSHS)

For students in Global Studies in Human Sciences, the world is their classroom. Students explore issues such as hunger, community development, sustainability, health, education, and international affairs in pursuit of solutions to our world's greatest challenges. Using design-thinking methodologies, students learn critical thinking and practical problem-solving skills to improve quality of life in communities around the world. Students also choose from a variety of relevant minors such as business, public health, and hunger studies to narrow their focus and apply lessons learned to various career fields.

The Global Studies curriculum prioritizes hands on experience through study abroad, a full time, semester-long internship, and a client-based capstone experience. Students gain vital professional skills including teamwork, cross-cultural communication, and professional writing in order to work effectively in their chosen field after graduation, whether they choose to focus their efforts locally or abroad.

Graduates of this interdisciplinary program leave Auburn University prepared to step into roles with multinational companies, philanthropic foundations, governmental and non-governmental organizations, and local non-profits. Students may also pursue graduate study in many fields ranging from public health and social entrepreneurship to law school and medical school. Regardless of their next steps, students leave empowered to enact practical, positive change in the world.
